Obama steps up app war to woo wavering voters

Alexandra Frean Washington

President Obama’s campaign team is stepping up its voter registration operation to restore its momentum after last week’s disastrous debate performance. With a new Pew opinion poll showing that the President’s Republican challenger Mitt Romney has wiped out the President’s lead, the Obama campaign is hoping to squeeze out every possible vote from the ranks of the US per cent of voters who have not yet decided who to vote for, or who could yet change their minds.

As in 2008, when an unprecedented grassroots and social networking operation helped Mr Obama to raise the number of voters, the Democrats have significantly more field offices in the key battleground states than the Republicans. Some of their offices never closed after the 2008 campaign.

As in 2008, when an unprecedented grassroots and social networking operation helped Mr Obama to raise the number of voters, the Democrats have significantly more field offices in the key battleground states than the Republicans. Some of their offices never closed after the 2008 campaign.

As in 2008, when an unprecedented grassroots and social networking operation helped Mr Obama to raise the number of voters, the Democrats have significantly more field offices in the key battleground states than the Republicans. Some of their offices never closed after the 2008 campaign.

As in 2008, when an unprecedented grassroots and social networking operation helped Mr Obama to raise the number of voters, the Democrats have significantly more field offices in the key battleground states than the Republicans. Some of their offices never closed after the 2008 campaign.

As in 2008, when an unprecedented grassroots and social networking operation helped Mr Obama to raise the number of voters, the Democrats have significantly more field offices in the key battleground states than the Republicans. Some of their offices never closed after the 2008 campaign.

As in 2008, when an unprecedented grassroots and social networking operation helped Mr Obama to raise the number of voters, the Democrats have significantly more field offices in the key battleground states than the Republicans. Some of their offices never closed after the 2008 campaign.

As in 2008, when an unprecedented grassroots and social networking operation helped Mr Obama to raise the number of voters, the Democrats have significantly more field offices in the key battleground states than the Republicans. Some of their offices never closed after the 2008 campaign.

As in 2008, when an unprecedented grassroots and social networking operation helped Mr Obama to raise the number of voters, the Democrats have significantly more field offices in the key battleground states than the Republicans. Some of their offices never closed after the 2008 campaign.

As in 2008, when an unprecedented grassroots and social networking operation helped Mr Obama to raise the number of voters, the Democrats have significantly more field offices in the key battleground states than the Republicans. Some of their offices never closed after the 2008 campaign.